"Bryan's knowledge of the facts and his presentation to the jury were exceptional," said client and Turbines' President Peg Mills. "His personal commitment to understanding our business and its products and services is what sets him apart in my mind."

As a trial attorney, Bryan's focus is on case winning strategies and achieving results. His first priority is to understand his client's objectives – what do they consider a win. He then works with his clients to develop a strategy to not only win, but to do so in a cost effective and efficient manner.

Clients rely on Bryan to handle complex litigation matters in state and federal courts across the country because of his tenacious quest to understand their business, discover and understand the facts at issue, effectively present and argue in court, and his ability and desire to win.

Bryan has extensive experience handling a wide variety of complex litigation, including cases involving master supply agreements, breach of contract claims, design defects, intellectual property disputes, theft of trade secrets and fraud. He handles matters involving manufacturing defects and product liability issues for aircraft and commercial/industrial machines, and leads investigations to determine causation and potential liability before litigation has commenced. He also represents clients in connection with bid protests and government contracts claims and disputes.

Bryan has represented clients in every facet of the aviation and aerospace industry for over 15 years, including original equipment manufacturers, component manufacturers, airlines, Part 135 operators, corporate flight departments, fixed base operators, Part 145 repair stations and more. He has extensive experience representing companies in a broad range of other industries, from software/IT to health care, and everything in between.

Prior to joining the legal profession, Bryan served as a police officer. He gained experience conducting investigations, interviewing witnesses, maintaining situational awareness, and making real time decisions under high stress situations. Bryan is also a pilot (Single Engine Land) and avid scuba diver.

EXPERIENCE

As an experienced trial attorney, Bryan recognizes that most disputes are resolved short of trial, but he approaches every matter as if it will be tried to a jury. This mindset ensures the case is handled in a strategic and deliberate manner from the onset. This ensures his client is informed and in the best position to achieve its goals. And if the matter cannot be resolved short of the courthouse, the case is properly prepared to go before a jury. Combined with focused preparation, and actual trial experience, Bryan has achieved excellent results out of the courthouse and numerous wins at trial. Bryan has tried 15 cases in state and federal courts across the country, eight as first chair.

In 2017, he successfully represented a manufacturer of turbine component parts against breach of contract claims seeking over $60 million in damages relating to a master supply agreement and whether parts met specifications and were properly manufactured.
