Stinson LLP Partners Robert Botts, Jr., Zane Gilmer and attorney Selena Samale authored an article for the Engineering and Mining Journal, "The Mining Industry Should Not Ignore ESG."

With environmental, social and corporate governance (ESG) becoming systematically woven into the fabric of the U.S. marketplace and business practice, the article provides mining companies with insight regarding the development and implementation of ESG policies as a strategic benefit.

Questions remain regarding the timeline and scope of ESG and related compliance requirements becoming legislatively mandated, but there are proactive steps mining companies can take.

"It's time to embrace the reality that ESG will soon be part of 'business as usual,' [and] that ESG will continue to have a larger impact on day-to-day operations," the attorneys write. "The sooner a company begins addressing ESG, the better prepared it will be for the future."

ESG policy reflects the public's opinion of a company's business practices and the attorneys write it can have a significant impact on the business' reputation, brand, and financial performance. They detail the benefits of adopting ESG and provide the framework for planning and implementing an effective ESG policy, including:

- Set attainable goals and objectives – and develop policies to ensure that the goals can be met.
- Think long-term, but plan in shorter phases.
- Consider what your company is already doing that satisfies aspects of ESG.
