Stinson LLP Partners Alisa Ehrlich and Nicci Warr authored an article for HR Daily Advisor, "After Judge Blocks FTC's Worker Non-Compete Ban, Now What?"

The attorneys discuss the recent decision by a Texas federal court to block the Federal Trade Commission's (FTC) rule banning most worker non-compete agreements, preventing the ban's enforcement across the United States. They highlight the impact of the court's decision, stating, "The Texas order setting aside the non-compete rule means that otherwise valid non-compete agreements will remain lawful and subject to enforcement for now."

The attorneys say the Texas ruling is good news for many employers that rely on non-competes to protect their trade secrets and other legitimate business interests. They also emphasize ongoing uncertainty surrounding the issue and note that FTC enforcement actions can still be brought on a case-by-case basis. They also advise employers to stay up-to-date on legal developments and to consider state laws when enforcing existing or executing new non-compete agreements, as well as to understand what rules are in place in the states where a company does business and where remote employees are located.

"Employers that have not already done so should review their non-compete strategies to ensure they serve legitimate business interests, that they are used judiciously, and that restrictions are narrowly tailored," they write.
